In Wall Street

The coal strike became an actuality last week. Virtually all of the bituminous workers in the country walked out of the mines on Saturday in obedience to orders from union headquarters and mining of soft coal practically ceased.

All through the week the possibility of a strike loomed higher and higher on the horizon. Hopes that the firm stand taken by the government would force the labor union to back off faded, but if there was any apprehension in financial circles over the unfavorable prospect it did not reflect in the market.

The unusual sight of security market prices forcing steadily ahead, even in the face of a coal strike, has been a noteworthy phenomenon. It is a reflection of the confidence of the country over the judgment of the Federal Reserve Board.

Wall Street expressed a recognition of the fact that the rate of interest on loans would be raised to 6 percent, the highest since the flurry in September. The Federal Reserve Board's decision was a surprise.

The Federal Reserve Bank of New York has made mention of the great expansion of banking credit, which has taken place since the middle of September.
